

A Sermon, Preached at Northampton, October 27, 1808, at the Opening of Northampton Bridge

The God, of whose being we have such evidence, is the Creator of all things visible and invisible. Of old he laid the foundation of the earth ;and the heavens are the work of his hands. It is HE, that hath lighted up the sun, the moon, and the stars, and hung them, as lamps in the sky. It is HE, that created the rivers, and scooped out a bason for the ocean, and filled it with water. It is HE, that hath formed the vegetables, from the least to the greatest. It is HE, that hath organized our bodies, with those of all animal things, and given us the breath of life. Further ;G od is to be regarded, as the author not only of all the works of nature, as they are called, but of those also, which, in diftinction from these, are called ARTIFICIAL. We are not, indeed, to be considered as mere machines. We have a proper agency of our own. But we arc so dependent on God, that HE is to be considered the author and finisher of every thing we do, that is lawful and wise. Every utensil we form ;every garment we make ;every house we build ;every bridge we erect, is in an important sense, the work of his hands. This will appear from several considerations. I. It is God who provides materials, without which we must be inactive. We cannot, like him, raise a fabric out of nothing. Nor is it enough, that we have m.aterial;- ,unless they be suitable. We might as well attempt to build a house or a bridge with nothing, as with some things in existence.
